Random Carp that I have Learned...

A look at modern practices and their medieval sources by K. Braden von Sobernheim

The first Sunday of Lent, being the Sunday after Ash Wednesday, is Quadragesima Sunday. This marks 40 days until Good Friday. The date is also called Piñata Sunday. Starting in the 14th century, a pignatta or “earthenware cooking pot,” was decorated with ribbons, tinsel, and colored paper. Filled with treats, a blindfolded individual would try to strike at the pot hanging in the air, spreading the treats for the rest of the guests.

When the Spanish arrived in the new world, they found a very similar tradition in place among the Aztecs celebrating the birthday of Huitzilopochtli (I’ll give you a minute while you sound that out), their solar and war deity. The celebration culminated in human sacrifices and a similar blindfolded celebrant breaking a feather decorated clay pot with a stick, causing treats to burst out as an offering. This celebration in mid-December was quickly co-opted for evangelical use, changing to a pot with seven points, representing the seven deadly sins. Other aspects of the ‘ceremony’ were given religious labels, transitioning one religious celebration into another.

Gradually the religious focus fell away leaving the piñata its celebratory nature for birthdays. You can still find the traditional star shape (and clay constructed versions) at traditional piñata sources both in Latin America and elsewhere. And now you know more random carp.
